PCSP 47/22           Discussion with the Commissioner Designate for Victims of Crime
Geraldine Hanna, Victims Commissioner spoke on the role of the Commissioner and outlined the remit of her role to advocate for best practice and monitor compliance with the Victims Charter which details the minimum standards of how victims of crime should be treated. The CIJINI inspection in 2020 found that the Charter has yet to be embedded across all agencies and that there is a sense of apathy and disconnect between criminal justice practitioners and the rights enshrined in the Charter. She clarified that the Commissioner does not have the powers to intervene in individual cases but that the role is to capture the themes and understand recurring issues and their impact on the victim.
The forthcoming strategy for the office of the Commissioner has a vision for a society in which victims feel protected, supported and have redress.

In her work to date the Commissioner identified three core issues:
Delays – exacerbated by the pandemic delays in bringing cases to court are unprecedented. It is estimated that without additional resources the backlog of cases will not be processed until 2028. Work is needed to view the criminal justice journey through the victims' lens and encourage criminal justice agencies to work together.

Data – there are ten plus case management systems across the various agencies. These systems are not designed to ‘talk’ to each other making it difficult to gather and disaggregate data e.g. age/gender. There is a need to map existing data and identify the gaps. An annual victims survey will enable data to be tracked.

Disclosure – greater scrutiny is need relating to the disclosure of victims information. What types of information and how specific this should be requires tighter restrictions around what can be exposed. In doing this the balance between Article 6 the Rights of the Accused and Article 8 the Rights of the Victim need to considered.

The Members were encouraged to keep up to date on the work of the Commissioner’s Office and to look out for the new website to be active in the next few weeks.

The Chair thanked the Commissioner for the very frank and open discussion and wished her well in her role.
